You Do Not Have to Be Job Hunting to Watch the Market

The roles employers are trying hardest to fill can tell you which practices are active, what experience is in demand, where firms are investing, and how expectations around flexibility, location, and seniority are changing.

That is why we are introducing Pernini Legal Hot Jobs.

Hot Jobs is not every open role. It is a selective snapshot based on our recruiters' current conversations with employers and candidates. Every featured position will be confirmed active, and confidential searches will be handled with appropriate discretion.

Whether you are ready to move, quietly curious, or simply thinking more intentionally about your future, we hope Hot Jobs helps you understand the market and recognize possibilities.

When was the last time you gave your career, and your resume, a real checkup?

Lawyers pay enormous attention to the documents they prepare for clients. Then I sometimes see the resume of an exceptionally accomplished lawyer and wonder why that same attention wasn't given to the document representing them.

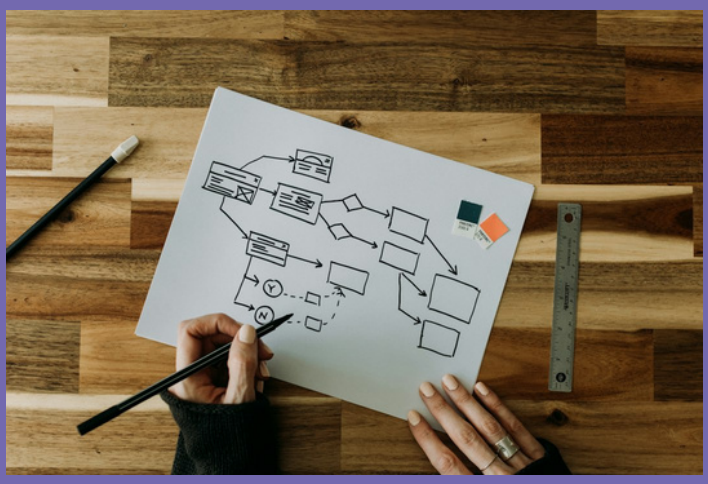

That's part of career ownership too.

Your resume shouldn't suddenly become important when you need a job. It should tell the story of the career you've been building all along.

My latest Teresa's Career Corner looks at six questions lawyers should periodically ask about where they are, how they're presenting themselves and where they're going.

Don't wait until you need options to start creating them.

People are people.

Sometimes the most meaningful conversations begin with someone you didn't know five minutes earlier.

A question about my nails became laughter in my dad's hospital room on a day when our family desperately needed something to laugh about.

It was also a reminder:
You don't have to agree about everything to recognize the humanity in each other.

Notice people. Talk to them. Listen.

The nails are the invitation. The conversation is the connection.
